SYNOPSIS

Divided into two chapters, Miracle follows young nun CRISTINA (19) as she sneaks out of her isolated monastery to attend to an urgent matter. Her enigmatic journey takes her all around town, but she is seemingly unable to solve her problem and find the man she is looking for. Out of options, she returns in the evening only to meet an unexpected fate on her way back to the convent.

The second part of the film deals with MARIUS PREDA (44), a determined police detective trying to understand what happened to her. Marius retraces Cristina's journey, step by step, through all the places she visited. In a perfectly mirrored structure, his investigation uncovers clues and revelations leading not only to the unfathomable truth behind Cristina's mysterious actions, but possibly, to an actual miracle as well.

DIRECTOR'S INTERVIEW

MIRACLE runs for almost two hours, but is composed of only forty-two sequence shots, including a stunning 16-minute long shot near the end of the film. How did you settle on the structure for this film, and how did you tackle this narrative setup cinematically?

A: The decision to shoot every single scene of MIRACLE as a long sequence shot didn't come from outside of the film – on the contrary, it sprang forward from its very heart, from its most innermost core. I very rarely - if ever - imagine shots and camera movements when writing the script, but in this particular case, I knew from the outset that the film requires these uninterrupted sequences where time flows unobstructed and is never manipulated by cuts. I don't want to reveal too much from the story but the viewers will realize at the end of the movie why the natural flow of time is so incredibly important in this film. And the realization comes almost in a shocking way. I can't imagine this story shot in any other way – in fact, it would simply not function if it was filmed differently.

In any case, the cinematic approach never resulted from a pre-conceived formalism, or cinematic philosophy, or desire to follow in the footsteps of the now iconic Romanian “neo-realism” signature style – in fact, for me at least, it almost marks the end of the road for it, in a personal way of course. While on the surface the film borrows some of the trademarked cinematic patterns of the Romanian New Wave, it actually blows them up right back in your face at the very end, putting the audience face to face with a much deeper filmic and emotional truth. My film is not about style, not for a single second – its form is built in into its very meaning. One cannot go without the other.

Your films are known for very strong performances, often delivered by new-coming actors. How did you cast this particular project, and what were some of the challenges encountered with long dialogues and especially with very complicated mise-en-scene sequences?

The casting process was extremely long and difficult, because of the unusual circumstances surrounding this particular project. MIRACLE is actually part of a larger trilogy set in my small town in Northern Romania. The stories are self-contained and completely independent – you can fully understand and appreciate each movie without seeing any of the others. However, the world of the three stories is the same; the locations and characters are the same – just as in Balzac's novels, main characters in a film can become secondary characters in the next one, and little stories link and find connection points across different movies. The first two films – UNIDENTIFIED and MIRACLE – were actually filmed at the same time, and also cast at the same time. Choosing actors for two movies took me six months and it was truly a grueling process. The unexpected bonus is that the third movie – to be shot next – is now basically cast already.

The challenges on set were also multi-faceted because we shot the two films simultaneously (we shot one film for four days, then we shot the next film for two days, then moved back to the first film for three days and so on until the end). In fact, some days, we shot scenes from one film until lunch, and scenes from the second film after lunch. It wasn't hard physically but creatively it was exhausting, because the two movies have completely different cinematic approaches, as dictated by their separate stories. My mind constantly switched from one story to the next, day after day, and it was challenging to keep track of so many threads.

In terms of the long and intricate mise-en-scene sequences – in particular for MIRACLE – the process is akin to finding the right shape for a complicated dance. First you need to find the essence and the truth of every important moment, regardless of the camera or the blocking for the actors. And then you keep adding the other layers – the pace, the rhythm, the shots, the transition between them, the movement, the mise-en-scene. You rehearse it with actors, you refine it, you find new ideas, you change it, you evolve it. It's hard work, especially for shots that last several minutes and end up being highly choreographed – but it allows for discovery at every step, and was always designed together with my amazing DP Oleg Mutu.

This elaborate work and painstaking cinematic approach were not done to reach a certain "realism", but to elevate each and every dramatic moment to its real emotional and filmic potential. And in this case, the uninterrupted sequences are fundamental to the entire construction of the film, its core theme, leading all the way to the devastating conclusion at the end – which turns the world upside down, almost literally.

What does the title refer to? What is a "miracle" for you?

In this film, I meant it plainly, and not at all metaphorically. Without going too deep into talking about certain definitions – from Spinoza and Voltaire to Hume and beyond – I invite a miracle into my film quite literally. Viewers can accept it or not, of course, it's up to them. But it's a violation of the laws of nature as we understand them, in the truest sense of the word. And by extension, it's a transgression of the basic laws that make cinema work. Paradoxically, the cinematic medium itself, when used in a particular way, is the very reason a miracle can be articulated and conveyed to the viewers.

You live in New York where you produce Sundance-winning American films, yet you direct movies in your native Romania. How do you manage to split your filmmaking career across two continents, and how does that affect your style?

It's actually very easy. Twenty years ago, when I left Romania to study film directing in the US, I felt I went to the other side of the world. Now, the world seems much smaller. I jump into a plane and I feel I am taking the bus – I can fly from Bucharest in the morning and reach New York in the afternoon. Distance is never a problem.

As for my moviemaking career, I don't feel I am an American filmmaker, and I don't feel I am a Romanian filmmaker. I feel I am simply myself and I am working towards telling my own personal stories in my own personal ways. Of course, your experiences make you who you are, they undoubtedly leave a mark on your creative process. But these are things best left unchecked and un-analyzed. When being creative, the best thing is to find a flow and let yourself be carried by the wave. Directors subconsciously make films they themselves want to see on the screen, so as long as my instinct tells me I am going in the right direction, I put my focus on the scene, on the movie, on the inner truth of a moment. Is it a genre film? Is it a Romanian film? Is it a faster-paced American film? I never think in those terms.

From the US, though, I think I have gained a huge respect for storytelling itself – the skills needed to tell a story in a truthful but also interesting way, the craft of moviemaking in all its minutiae, the desire to engage the audience at every moment (regardless of the scale of the film) - while trying to stay away from the beaten path and always striving to find ways to tell stories in unexpected, new ways. I'm very interested not just in stories, but in the ways one can tell a story. Sometimes, this gets lost in the US.

You've opted for a rather controversial pivotal scene at the midpoint of the film. What was your approach with this particular part of the story?

I can certainly see how one could find that particular sequence controversial.

First, however, I would point out that the scene is at the base of the whole dramatic structure – without that scene, there is no movie, no premise upon which to build anything. Cut that scene, and the movie doesn't exist. So it's a must-have unit - MIRACLE would be a completely different movie without it.

And secondly, the scene is not shot in a shocking way - quite the contrary. There was never any desire to make it into a "controversial" scene that would keep people talking about the film. I would ask anyone who was deeply touched by that scene to watch the film again, and pay close attention to the way it was shot, the direct relationship to the end of the film, the visual and cinematic connections to the other units of the story. It's a scene done with artistry and respect for cinema and the audience as a whole, and not one a scene designed to shock the viewers in order to gather attention onto the film for the wrong reasons.

Ten years ago, precisely, your first film (PERIFERIC / OUTBOUND) premiered in Locarno. Now you come out with basically two films at once. What's next? Will you keep directing Romanian films?

Not necessarily. It's hard to plan your life as a film director because new things spring up very often and they hijack your life. You think you're going to do this film, but an offer comes along for another film and if the stars align, you decide to make that instead first. So, everything else changes afterwards, almost like domino pieces.

In any case, I need to finish the third film from my Romanian trilogy, so yes, I'll direct at least one more film in my native country. But I live and work in New York City, where I teach film directing at Columbia University. So, I will start directing in the United States as well.
