SYNOPSIS

Wilby Wonderful is a bittersweet comedy about the difference a day makes. Over the course of twenty-four hours, the residents of the tiny island town of Wilby try to maintain business as a sex scandal threatens to rock the town to its core.

The town's video store owner, Dan Jarvis (James Allodi) – depressed over the pending revelations about his love life – decides to end it all, but keeps getting interrupted by Duck MacDonald (Callum Keith Rennie), the town's dyslexic sign-painter, during his half-hearted suicide attempts. Meanwhile, Dan has enlisted blindly ambitious real estate agent Carol French (Sandra Oh) to sell his house in an effort to quickly tie up the last of his loose ends. Carol, however, is more interested in selling her recently deceased mother-in-law's house to Mayor Brent Fisher (Maury Chaykin), in order to get in with the in-crowd.

To take her social step up, Carol could use the help of her police officer husband Buddy (Paul Gross), but Buddy has his hands full with sexy, wrong-side-of-the-tracks Sandra Anderson (Rebecca Jenkins), who can never decide if she is coming or going. Sandra's daughter Emily (Ellen Page), is none too thrilled about her mother repeating her typical pattern of married men and bad reputation, but Emily herself is just about to have her heart broken for the very first time. Of course everyone's concerns are going to be very different tonight when someone finds the body in the closet. Welcome to Wilby.

ABOUT THE PRODUCTION

MacIvor always planned to shoot the film in his home province of Nova Scotia, but he hadn't expected to end up on the South Shore. "I was always imagining we'd be working in the North end of the province, closer to Cape Breton, but we heard about Shelburne and the Film Centre facility and went up for a scout. We loved it immediately. The studio was great and Shelburne was a perfect Wilby. After our preliminary scout, I began a re-write to accommodate the great locations I found in Shelburne."

A refurbished naval base, the Shelburne Film Centre (nicknamed "Camp Wilby") became residence, production office, dining hall, recreation centre, and home to the cast and crew. MacIvor thought it was a great facility, and the added bonus of having the entire cast and crew spend time together off screen was invaluable to the development of the team mentality that imbued the shoot. "So often during filming everyone just heads off at the end of the day and the shoot can become just another gig. But what we had going on was more of an experience—a community was formed—and we were all part of it, from drivers to hair and make-up, from actors to producers. It was a great time—Camp Wilby will be long remembered."

Wilby Wonderful features a stellar ensemble of Canada's most talented performers.

MacIvor wrote the part of Dan Jarvis for James Allodi. The two have worked together for many years in the theatre and Allodi played the lead in MacIvor's short film, Permission. "Dan Jarvis is a troubled man who feels he has nowhere to turn and no one to confide in. I wrote the part for Jim knowing he could handle the silence Dan carries with him—Jim has an amazing ability to command attention by simply being silent and still. He has a phenomenal presence, and as well a sense of melancholy that Dan needed. He brings such life to Dan.”

The multi-talented Allodi has been following the script through its many stages of development. “One of the things that really appealed to me was the fact the story takes place during one day. Every time you do a scene, you are obligated to find the emotional continuity of that scene, something that appears to take place one minute later on screen may have actually been shot two weeks earlier. It makes you do your homework. And it’s that preparation that gets you under the skin of the character; it makes you look for the details, the small moments that define the emotional journey. And that’s what Wilby is, really: a series of these beautiful, intimate moments.”

When writing the part of Mayor Brent Fisher, MacIvor always had Maury Chaykin in mind. “Brent Fisher is not a bad guy, but he knows how to play the game”, explains MacIvor. “He is just one of the boys in the good-old-boys network; he sees little harm in what he does. Inside the story he is certainly a villain, but I didn’t want it played that way. I knew Maury would give it a twist.”

Paul Gross plays police officer Buddy French. “When Paul’s name came up for Buddy I was very excited about the sense of heroism he could bring to the character,” says MacIvor. “Paul does that so well. But I also needed him to be a failing hero. On the first day I said to Paul, ‘I need you to go to an insecure place and play Buddy from there.’ Which he did, beautifully. Paul’s work in this movie is lovely. Very gentle, open and vulnerable. He is a tremendous actor.”

A multi-tasker himself, he had a clear idea of what MacIvor was trying to capture. Says Gross, “When I read the script, I thought it was really beautiful, very carefully observed, a very detailed slice of a particular kind of community. It is a very subtle, believable and effective piece of writing, where the sum of the ensemble is larger than the individual parts. I have admired Daniel’s work over the years, but I’ve never actually worked with him before. It has been a terrific experience.”

Rebecca Jenkins plays Sandra Anderson, who has just moved back to Wilby after many years away. When MacIvor offered Jenkins the part, she was very excited about the opportunity to play someone who was always trying to look for the positive. MacIvor explains, “Rebecca’s played a lot of dark and brooding characters in the past, but if I had to pick one word to define Rebecca as a person it would be ‘sunshine.’” Jenkins is a talented musician (a beautiful song she wrote and sings appears in the film), and an award-winning actor who has worked with MacIvor on both of his last two projects, Marion Bridge, which he wrote, and Past Perfect, which he wrote, directed and co-starred in with Jenkins. “Daniel and I have developed a kind of a short hand...it’s actually getting to the point where we can look at one another and without a word get both the question and the answer.”

Sandra Oh, well known for her comedic talents and award-winning dramatic performances, brings a rich mixture of edge and pathos to Carol French. “Because of Carol’s tunnel vision ambition and almost desperate need to be accepted, she could have very easily been played broadly and one-note, but Sandra has such a sensitivity to Carol. She understands her struggle of needing to be accepted by the community, and her misguided choices to reach that goal,” says MacIvor. “From day one Sandra nailed it brilliantly and brought so much humanity to the role, more than I saw myself actually.” Born and raised in Ottawa, Sandra Oh was thrilled to come home to Canada when offered the part by MacIvor. “I thought the script was great, but mostly I wanted to do this film to work with Daniel.”

After meeting Ellen Page on Marion Bridge and witnessing her formidable talent, MacIvor began re-writing the role of the intelligent, wise-for-her-years Emily Anderson specifically for Page. “I think Ellen is amazing,” says MacIvor. “She is emotionally connected in ways that I could only ever dream of being. Emily is in the midst of a difficult sexual awakening, and that is not easy to play at sixteen. But Ellen does it with grace and truth. After her first experience with MacIvor, Page was excited to have the opportunity to work with him again. “Daniel is such a wonderful writer and director, but really I think it comes down to the fact that we trust one another,” she says.

For the role of Duck MacDonald, MacIvor turned to friend and fellow actor Callum Keith Rennie. “Callum is similar to Duck in a lot of ways,” says MacIvor. “I think of them both as angels, but in the old sense of an angel, the kind with armour and wings.” Rennie, a Genie Award-winning actor, admired the way the storylines came together with such humour and heart. “I hadn’t played this kind of character before. There is a kindness and gentleness to him. He doesn’t have a lot of conflict, but he has deep concerns and hopes,” says Rennie. “I have known Daniel for fifteen years, and I am really happy to have this opportunity to work with him. He is very adept at getting what he wants. He has a way of getting his ideas across with gentleness.”

For Daniel MacIvor, Wilby Wonderful is a gentle and intimate story of hope and the importance of believing that we live in a world of creation, not destruction. In fact, we create that world by believing in it. “In a more complex way of looking at it, the movie is about reflection and inversion,” says MacIvor. “If we allow ourselves to exist as the reflection of others’ perceptions of us, that reflection is inverted, reversed—it can lead us to missteps and bad choices. But in the world I aspire to live in, even bad choices can lead us to understanding. Sometimes everything ends up backwards, but as this film says, sometimes the backwards way is better.”

MacIvor is a director who loves to write. “One of the things I take from my work in the theatre is a fluidity around story and script. No element is too small to be considered essential, and no element too important not to be potentially eliminated. We have to be able to evolve with the story as it evolves.” But that doesn’t mean a throw-the-script-away-and-improvise attitude on set. “We very much stick to the script on the day – although chances are it has changed considerably from the day before.” MacIvor explains, “I continue to write through the shoot. As long as the actors will take changes, I’ll give them changes. We try to keep the script alive and breathing through the shoot, always continuing to uncover the story beneath it.”

One challenge MacIvor set for himself was to make the story take place in a twenty-four hour period. “I am interested in time – what time means. This comes from my work in the theatre—a time-based medium. Time always figures prominently for me. 24 hours is interesting because to make it seem plausible, the revelations and changes must be gentle, small—deciding to stay, or try, or not try at all.”

Another challenge MacIvor happily met was the demanding work of creating an engaging multi-storyline film. “I set that up as a challenge for myself. But really the multi-storyline battle was won with the casting of the ensemble. God couldn’t have cast this movie better.”

WILBY WONDERFUL REVIEWS

Atmosphere, optimism work wonders in 'Wilby'

By Wesley Morris

Boston Globe

Published: 03/18/2005

For fans of the well-made eccentric Canadian ensemble comedy, today is a good day at the Brattle Theatre, where Daniel MacIvor's "Wilby Wonderful" begins a weekend run. For those unacquainted with the genre, this movie, set in the course of a day in small-town Nova Scotia, is a worthy introduction, landing somewhere between Don McKellar's underrated Y2K romance "Last Night" and the over-preciousness of Jeremy Podeswa's "The Five Senses."

MacIvor, who wrote, directed, and acts in "Wilby," introduces us to about a dozen characters, each of whom is caught in momentary distress about life on the eponymous little island.

Since his wife left him, Dan Jarvis (James Allodi) has been feeling suicidal. His attempts are consistently, amusingly interrupted by fellow islanders, like Duck (Callum Keith Rennie), the friendly local handyman, and Carol (Sandra Oh), the uptight real estate agent who's trying to sell Dan's house. Sssh: The mayor (Maury Chaykin) might be a buyer.

Carol's husband, Buddy (Paul Gross), a Wilby cop, is having an affair with Sandra (Rebecca Jenkins). She left town years ago and is back with her teenage daughter Emily (Ellen Page), who in the jaunty opening sequence runs across town for a make-out session with a boy.

Wilby is one of those traditional-seeming towns that is actually more socially progressive than it appears. You get the sense from the punks and the gays and the lone woman of color that anyone could live here if only they knew it existed. The place is also so dull that the mayor might have to manufacture a little scandal over at the local park so he can benefit for his own selfish reasons.

But not even municipal corruption seems all that terrible in Wilby. Nothing extraordinary happens here. But nothing especially ordinary does either. MacIvor, who plays Stan, Buddy's dim partner, is quite good at not crowding the characters with all kinds of plot. The film is more behavior-driven than anything else, and most of the cast has worked with each other before, so the film has a chummy atmosphere.

Admirers of Mina Shum's 1994 romantic comedy "Double Happiness" might be pleased to see the reunion of Rennie and Oh (the "pour girl" from "Sideways"). And anyone desperate to see what happened to Gross since CBS's Mountie-in-Chicago show, "Due South," went off the air need look no further.

Despite its hipster-coffeehouse soundtrack, foul mouth, randy characters, and violent patches, "Wilby" is wholesome and ultimately remarkable for its optimism. The film's title stems from a mishap with a banner, but it's also a prediction that sums up the local state of mind: We'll Be Wonderful. This may not seem like anything special, but you can see where the movie might have taken a dark detour and chose instead to accentuate the positive. There's room for everyone in Wilby except cynics.

Wonderful idea for a short story

Welcome to the small island community of Wilby, where all hell is about to break loose. Wilby is populated by a veritable who's who of Canadian actors, so while this story is sometimes uneven, it's always fun to watch.

Wilby Wonderful is a short story on the big screen, a single day's activity involving disparate but connected characters. Much can change in one day, especially in a small town where everyone knows everyone else.

In Wilby, a sadsack guy (James Allodi) quietly wanders around trying to commit suicide. His bridge-jumping is thwarted, his gas-inhaling is interrupted and a motel maid gets in the way of a hanging. Frustrating.

Meanwhile, an uptight local real estate agent (Sandra Oh) hopes to sell the mayor (Maury Chaykin) a house, her cop husband (Paul Gross) flirts with another woman, that other woman (Rebecca Jenkins) is fighting with her teenage daughter (Ellen Page), and the local handyman (Callum Keith Rennie) quietly observes people around town and helps out where he can.

It seems a scandal of sorts has taken place in Wilby, and the local newspaper intends to print the names of everyone involved. Some locals are frightened, some are shocked, some are happy to live and let live.

Wilby Wonderful is pleasant enough storytelling with a handful of truly brilliant scenes -- most involving Jenkins, Page, Oh or Rennie. The drama aspects of the movie work better than the comedy, however. Sometimes Wilby Wonderful seems like an awkward marriage between a feature film and a TV sitcom.

At any rate, writer/director Daniel MacIvor (who also appears in Wilby as an idiot cop) captures something uniquely Canadian in this film. That's generally a good thing.

TIFF 2004 UPDATE

Wilby Wonderful

Directed by Daniel Maclvor

CANADA/99 MINUTES/CONTEMPORARY WORLD CINEMA

Wilby Wonderful follows in the footsteps of films like Short Cuts and Magnolia - particularly the latter - as it features a wide cast of lonely, miserable people.

Writer/director Daniel Maclvor does a wonderful job of establishing this small town - called, coincidentally enough, Wilby - to the extent that we feel like we know the place by the time the movie's over. The cast is uniformly superb, but Paul Gross especially deserves kudos for playing way against type as a scruffy and nondescript cop who's just trying to do the right thing. And as expected with a movie of this ilk, there are certain characters that are far more intriguing than others (ie Sandra Oh's Carol never quite becomes much more than a twitchy annoyance, despite Oh's surprisingly effective performance). Maclvor proves to be a much more effective screenwriter than director, though his low-key style quickly proves to be an ideal match for the material. In the end, Wilby Wonderful is an engaging - though not entirely memorable - look at small town life.

June 22: "Wilby Wonderful"

The "Gilmore Girls" meets a happy version of the "Shipping News" in playwright Daniel MacIvor's island world of Wilby. (Frameline fans will remember MacIvor's work from festival favorites "Beefcake" and "Take-Out"; he's been invited to attend the screening.) The film opens with the foiling of mild-mannered Dan Jarvis's suicide attempt by unlikely handyman Duck MacDonald (Callum Keith Rennie). Throughout the movie, Jarvis (James Allodi), makes repeated attempts, but it seems residents in his small Nova Scotian community have an uncanny knack for getting into each others' business even at the most personal moments. In fact, the grapevine is busy all over town with the news of the illicit (read: gay) sex happening at the one remaining undeveloped area on the tiny island, the Watch, and the impending naming of names in the local rag is apparently the cause for Jarvis' despair. Police chief Buddy (the lovable Paul Gross, who played Brian Hawkins in "Tales of the City") works to unravel who has committed exactly what crime, while his wife, Carol (the deliciously funny Sandra Oh of "Sideways" and "Under the Tuscan Sun"), kicks up a whirlwind trying to sell real estate and get in good with the mayor. She threatens to lose it when, through a misconstrued communication -- reminiscent of the childhood game of Telephone -- Duck posts a sign readings "Wilby Wonderful" instead of "Wonderful Wilby." At times, the story's a bit too pat, and the music gets in the way. Still, for a lighthearted good time with a story in which tolerance and justice rule the day, check out this amusing, offbeat romantic comedy.
